CANADA

For over 13,000 years, blueberries have been part of North American human history. First nations have forever known the cycle of the blueberry bush. They are harvested for fresh consumption, but also smoked for later in the season, or mixed with wild meat to make pemmican.

The domestication of blueberries started at the beginning of the last century, leading to great agricultural success. Our continent nowadays produces almost 1 billion pounds a year of the berry. There are two main varieties of bush that we harvest; short bush, all of which is cultivated in the east, with Quebec dominating production in Canada, and tall bush, of which BC and the Fraser Valley produce the bulk of.

There are 6 main varieties of tall bush blueberries produced by over 600 farms in our province, with harvest starting, as early as mid-June and continuing all the way into September. An astonishing 80,000 tons are produced seasonally in BC, of which 1 ton typically ends up in my mouth. A single bush can produce between 700 and 1000 berries in a season. Canada has become one of the worlds biggest producers of blueberries, and we consume about 1.2 kilos per person per year. There must be about 1.5 million people who don't eat any to balance my personal consumption. As you figured out, I love blueberries, and when in season I eat them fresh by the bucket, so it's rare I have any leftovers. Here's what I do with what's left: always, like other berries, wash just before you eat or process. If freezing, make sure that you dry the fruit and lay a flat on a tray to completely freeze before bagging. You can also partially process by cooking the berry with or without sugar, and just a little bit of fresh lemon juice to help maintain the colour and then freeze in ice cube trays or any freezable container to be used later in cooking. Smoothies, pies, or simply to make fridge jam are a great and quick way to use those pre-prepared berries.

Experiment with popsicles, sorbet and ice cream, for refreshing summer treats. Jams, syrups, muffins, cookies, pies, crumbles, cheesecakes, and the list can go on forever. They can be made with fresh or frozen fruit to bring summer vibes to the other three seasons. Blueberries love being paired with all sorts of cheeses. Fresh cow or goat, as well as brie, blue and even aged varieties. Salads, sweet or savoury, and salsas, love blueberries. Try them in dressings or make your own blueberry BBQ sauce. Braise some meat or finish your favourite BBQ fish with a blueberry sauce. However you decide to enjoy this sweet and tart little berry, don't forget that it's also loaded in healthy goodness.

Drink Smarter, Live Better Alcohol and Kidney Health

By: The Choices Nutrition Team

Alcohol can play a role in celebratory moments from weddings, graduations, to birthday parties. But as many of us know, it can also leave a substantial impact on families, communities, and health spanning mental and physical aspects. In 2023, the Canadian Centre on Substance Use and Addiction (CCSA) released updated guidelines on alcohol consumption, replacing the 2011 version.

Since the 2011 publication, more and more research shows the vast health implications moderate to heavy alcohol consumption can cause. From liver damage, heart disease, increased risk of cancers, and mental health issues, the 2023 guidelines note that abstinence from alcohol is technically the healthiest option. Obviously, that isn't always realistic for everyone, so the CCSA has categorized weekly drinking markers based on risk. They've noted 2 drinks or less per week as "low risk," 3-6 drinks per week as "moderate risk," or increased risk for certain cancers; and 7 or more drinks per week as "high risk," or increased risk for heart disease and stroke. The CCSA also notes that trying to avoid drinking more than 2 drinks on any given day is also important in reducing risks.

Like many things diet and health-related, it's important not to have an all or nothing approach. Reducing your drinking habits in small steps or increments can be greatly beneficial and it's key to remember any reduction in your average alcohol intake has benefits. Looking for healthier replacements such as mocktails or sparkling water can also be a good strategy. If you or a loved one is struggling with alcohol addiction, please speak to a family physician or doctor.

Under Pressure? Foods To Bring Blood Pressure Down Naturally

By: The Choices Nutrition Team

High blood pressure is on the rise in Canada, with a recent finding showing 23% of Canadian adults diagnosed. A disease that's also linked with an increased risk for heart disease, stroke, diabetes, and dementia, here are some foods to add if you have high blood pressure.

1. Fruit and Vegetables: Specifically, the potassium, nitrates, and antioxidants content of these foods have been shown to help with hypertension; for nitrates it's the natural sources that are beneficial. Great sources of potassium include legumes, bananas, varieties of potatoes or yams, and spinach or tomatoes. Beets and beet juice are great sources of nitrates and fruit like blueberries and strawberries are a great source of an antioxidant, anthocyanins, which can also help lower blood pressure.

2. Fibre: Eating more whole grains or complex carbohydrates can also increase your intake of soluble fibre which can help lower cholesterol and reduce inflammation, both contributing to lowering high blood pressure. Great sources include oats, legumes, flaxseed, barley, avocados, and psyllium.

3. Water: This one seems pretty self-explanatory, but ensuring adequate hydration is also key for overall kidney health and hypertension management. Dehydration can lead to the restriction of blood vessels, blood pressure spikes, and fluctuations. Thus, drinking 8-10 cups of fluid or water can be a key daily habit to instill.

The kidneys are responsible for filtering waste in our blood, a key job impacting countless organs and systems. These are a few additions you can make to your diet but being mindful of overall salt intake is also important. If you have any more questions around this topic speak to your family physician or book a free 60-minute consultation with a Choices in-store nutritionist.
